BY T. E. MACAULAY.

From the Second Volume of the Life of Macaulay, by Trevelyan.

(That same night—July 30th, 1827), while the town was still alive with jubilation over a triumph that soon lost its gloss, even in the eyes of those who won it, Macaulay, in the grateful silence of his chamber, was weaving his pointed thoughts into those exquisite lines which fall within the compass of a score of stanzas, the essential secret of whose life without outward aspect these volumes have endeavoured to portray.—Trevelyan's Life of Macaulay).

"After a time the young ones were hatched, and the father still acted as nurse to them, showing a care almost love, which (so common among mammals) is very uncommon among birds. There is some difficulty in feeding these young rainbow fish, but M. Carbonnier is in great hopes that this marvellous and beautiful little fish will become acclimated in France. Should he succeed, he will have added an entirely new fish to the present inhabitants of the fresh aquaria, and earned the gratitude of those who, delighted to study the works of the Great Creator, perfect and marvellous even among the most interesting representatives of the inhabitants of the ocean, whether in the depths of the ocean, or in stagnant water of the marshes of the distant India. I must remind my reader that the English sticklebacks, so abundant in our ditches, hornpipes, &amp;c., do not breed and deposit eggs therein, in the spring and summer months. By placing these in our aquaria we may have some idea of the acclimation of the lovely fish, the rainbow fish, or 'King of Lakes,' Frank Blackwood, in London."

ture floating, everything being made snug, he mounted guard over the nest and eggs, taking up his position in a kind of doorway which he had made to the nest.

Not deigning to let his glances rest on me.

Swept carelessly by the gorgeous Queen of Gaul,

More scornful still, the Queen of Fashion passed,

With mingling gait and air of cold disdain;

The Queen of Power tossed high her jewelled crown,

And off her shoulder threw a wreath of flowers;

The Queen of Wealth, in all her wealth, her eyes were

More bright than diamonds, more resplendent than

A room in an old mansion, long untenanted;

That room, though poor, was enriched from the light;

Yet through the curtains shone the moon's cold ray;

Sleeping fitfully soft upon an infant's bairn;

The first queen who ruleth over birth;

Drew nigh to speak the newborn bairn's name;

With hoarse step, which so far from earth,

From gloom they came, and vanished into gloom.

Not deigning to let his glances rest on me.
